

Caring, caring deeply

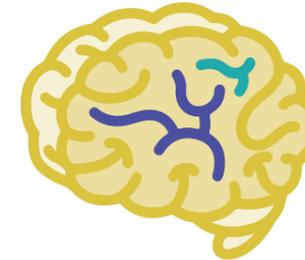

by Karima

Curiosity, genuine curiosity

Embracing discomfort

There is a distinction between feeling discomfort and feeling unsafe. The card refers to the former.*

Giving & Taking

It takes a village

Balance between asking questions & observation

From rigid interviews to fluid conversations

How do the effects of structured interviews and organic conversations converge? How do the effects of structured interviews and conversations diverge?

Is it necessary to give back as well as take? What are the effects of taking? What are the effects of giving?

What are the lenses that you use to see the world? How does asking questions influence how you understand the world?

What does embracing discomfort mean for you? What are the effects of feeling uncomfortable?

What does 'team' mean to you? Who could be included in your team?

What are the effects of curiosity in how we interact and learn? How can we express curiosity?

How does the length of a question influence engagement? How can we use questions to inspire deep thinking?

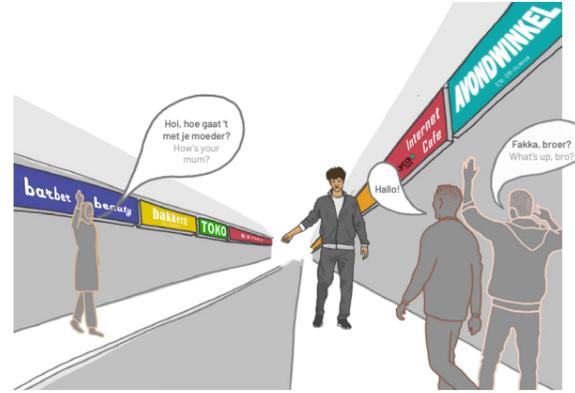

What is the power of care? How does caring affect how we think, behave, and interact?

Presence versus absence: reading the air

Multilingualism versus translation

Differentiation

Visibility & trust

Can we infer meaning through absence? In what contexts can it be beneficial to 'read the air'?

In what contexts can we embrace multilingualism? In what contexts is translation necessary?

What are the impacts of seeing your reflection around you? How does having shared experiences influence how we think, feel, care and act?

How and where can we differentiate in our approach to co-creation? What resources are required? What effects can this have on engagement?

In what ways do you see manifestations of living histories? How does it affect the present?

How can trust be built? In what ways can we become more visible with those we engage with? How can visibility support engagement?

What are our aims? Are they achievable with the approaches that we currently have? If not, in what ways can they adapt and change to realise different outcomes?
